Virtual Ed Link, Inc. CEO Details College Safety Management System in Interview on Stockbully.com

FAIRFIELD, NJ--(Marketwire - September 3, 2008) - Virtual Ed Link, Inc. (VELI) (PINKSHEETS: VRED), the developer and marketer of the leading edge technology platform for VELI's School and College Safety Management Systems, today announced that CEO John Bay was interviewed on www.stockbully.com. With emphasis on the unfortunate continuing violence in school and college campuses, Mr. Bay focused on the company's Safety Management Systems, which are designed to provide a culture of preparedness, and significantly improve campus security across the country.

Mr. Bay points out in his interview comments that School and college administrators responsible for student, teacher, and staff safety have become inundated with parent concerns about security and safety at schools from K-12 to leading universities. As incidents continue to occur, the need for crisis management becomes more evident. As an example, Mr. Bay pointed out that New York State estimates that this coming school year will find the highest level of violence in recent years. The solution, he says, is a comprehensive program to prepare, plan, teach, train and direct all involved so that violence can be avoided or managed with greater control, if it should occur.

Mr. Bay declared, "A holistic approach to crisis management as it is embedded in the VELI platform goes a long way towards a lower level of potential confusion, and the increased level of safety, so necessary to protect school populations."

The entire interview can be heard on Stockbully.com, which gives attention to emerging growth companies that seek more exposure in the investment community. "We have positioned ourselves to be one of the leaders in college and high school campus security. Now that the federal government, through the Department of Homeland Security, has become more involved in campus safety, the market for solutions has expanded significantly," stated Bay. "I feel that we have the best solutions to the security issues facing our schools today."
